Letter from the President

GOODBYE LOUIE

When you stop and think about it, there are many different types of personalities in our business. This list of characters include Owners, Bankers (some would argue these are the same people, but that story is for another time), Sales People, Engineers, Project Managers, Glazing Superintendents, Glaziers, Helpers, etc.

Louie Duncan started out as a Glazier and became a Glazing Superintendent. He had worked in this business for 50 years. In talking with some of the people that he worked with, the one theme that kept recurring was he was "tough but fair".

I met Louis a few years ago in my association with the glass business and the TGA/NTD Christmas Party. He was very generous in that he would bring many toys for the toy drive the night of the Christmas Party.

Our next generation of Glazing Superintendents could have learned a lot from Louie. We owe him and his generation a great debt of gratitude for hopefully what he passed down to us as far as knowledge of the business is concerned. Needless to say all our thoughts and prayers go out to his family at this time.

Sadly, I was not able to attend his funeral so I will use this venue to say....from all of us that knew him....GOODBYE LOUIE.

Danny R. Goode
President

A Big Thanks to:

CGA Developing Code on Frameless Shower Doors

The California Glass Association (CGA) is developing and writing a building code pertaining to frameless shower doors.

“We are near completion,” said Donn Harter, president of the CGA.

“Currently there is not one sentence in the International Building Code (IBC) about this [shower doors],” he said.

According to Harter, the CGA is currently working with code organizations to develop a document that will be proposed for inclusion in the IBC

Help Wanted!

GANA Offers an Industry-Specific Job Search

The Glass Association of North America (GANA) is introducing a new website aimed at matching those seeking employment in the glass industry with employers. The site, found at www.glassjobsearch.com, features job listings as well as resume searches and company profiles for prospective employers. Though posting job listings and resumes is fee-based with competitive rates, GANA members do receive a discount.

By providing a simple, intuitive interface, GANA will be providing one of only a few job search websites specific to the industry that isn't outsourced.

Industry Specific

One of the disadvantages of an outsourced job search that prospective employers have expressed to GANA staff is that listings are inevitably segmented into a "one-size-fits-all" mentality that does not embrace the specifics of the glass and glazing industry accurately. By providing a job search by the industry, for the industry, GANA members will be able to keep the subtle industry nuances within the parameters of the search. Furthermore, with no cross-referencing of other industries lumped together with glass and glazing, users will see two benefits:

- Fewer workers lost to other industries; and
- Fewer non-glass industry experts crossing over into a job that doesn't accurately fit their knowledge base.

The Job Hunt

Version 1.0 of GlassJobSearch debuted at the beginning of June, but its evolution will continue with the feedback offered by those who will use it the most—glass industry companies offering job listings and potential employees seeking those jobs. This feedback is important in increasing not only the effectiveness of the search, but also in keeping the "by the industry, for the industry" mantra evident in the site itself.

GlassJobSearch 1.0 offers a basic set of features. First and foremost, it offers companies the opportunity to provide job listings that have customized descriptions, qualifications and more. Companies place the job in one of 13 separate categories that run the gamut from human resources to sales to installation positions. Additionally, companies listing jobs can fill out a profile that describes employee benefits, information about the company itself and other pertinent details.

Job seekers can search for employment based on a number of criteria, including educational requirements, location of the position, type of position or even by company. Additionally, they will be able to browse through the aforementioned company profiles to gain more information about their prospective employer.

In addition, job seekers can post resumes for potential employers to browse. Those posting resumes will fill out an online form to determine their experience, education and other relevant criteria. They can also upload their resume, which will be converted to a PDF and offered as a download to companies seeking employees. Posting a resume on a website created by an industry association assures the expected number of browsers each month will be significant.

Finally, all who use the website to post jobs or resumes will be given the opportunity to fill out a comprehensive feedback survey to evaluate the site's effectiveness, workability and future features set to be implemented in GlassJobSearch 2.0. Stop by the site and start using it as a tool to have the best possible people in your company's employment.

It is with our deepest sympathy that we send out our thoughts and prayers to the family and friends of Louie Duncan, Vice-President, Field Operations for Haley-Greer, Inc. Mr. Duncan passed away July 14th.

Glass firms reflect on threat of green ruling

Debate is raging in the construction industry about the external facades of commercial buildings. The government will next year introduce rules on energy performance, which will mean big changes for glass manufacturers.

One adviser to the amendments to Part L of the Building Regulations told CJ that contractors working on office buildings will need to use less glass in facades to meet regulations for low-carbon design.

The source said: "It is recommended at 40% of the building's area, whereas for the past few years, buildings tended to be fully glazed over. We would encourage building designers to use less glass."

However, Pilkington market development manager for Europe Rick Wilberforce argued that glass will help buildings meet carbon targets.

He said: "We don't see the regulations in themselves placing any limits on glazing. There's nothing inherent in the regulations that will cause a reduction in glass facades."

"Our view is that large areas of glazing could be quite positive from an energy point of view. We shouldn't just look at a window in terms of U-value and energy loss."

Wilberforce said innovations in coatings will control heat and light in buildings. He added that the regulations will see an increase in twin-skin facades.

He added: "The Building Regulations in general are a major driver for business and Part L is particularly important to glazing manufacturers. It's an issue that's very high on the agenda."

Davis Langdon partner Simon Rawlinson agreed that specifiers will choose glass facades, as buildings will be measured for their overall carbon production. He said: "The U-values have remained the same from 2002, so there are no materials that are going to be disadvantaged. It's their overall contribution to carbon reduction targets, and this is where solar shading and controlling heat gains at the building's perimeter comes in."

Rawlinson said heaters and coolers have the biggest influence in reducing carbon emissions. "It gets very complicated, but if you do reduce solar gain at the perimeter, you get a saving in the cooling plant."

Enter the First GANA and USGlass Photo Contest

The Glass Association of North America (GANA) and USGlass magazine are accepting entries for the first GANA and USGlass Photo Contest. The contest will recognize photography that illustrates innovative uses of glass. Photographs will be judged in two categories, professional and amateur, and six sub-categories:

- Commercial Exterior
- Residential Exterior
- Commercial Interior
- Residential Interior
- Decorative Glazing
- Industry in Action (this includes glass installation/construction, manufacturing/fabricating, handling, etc.).

Entries must be of projects completed between January 1, 2004 and December 31, 2005, and must be received no later than January 7, 2006. There is no fee to enter and you may submit more than one photo.

Winners will be announced during Glass Week 2006, which will take place January 28-February 2 at the Marriott Laguna Cliffs Resort in Dana Point, Calif., and recognized in USGlass magazine. They will also receive a glass award.
